on a frown; and curiosity to learn his "plan" prompted her to give an affirmative reply.

"Well," said Fred, turning back a few pages in his "Ride to Khiva," "listen to this. Capt. Burnaby, describing the station house along the road which he traveled in Russia. says, among other things: 'A book in which to inscribe complaints was kept, and any traveler who felt himself aggrieved would write down his grievance, which would be subsequently investigated by an inspector, whose duty, it was to perform this task once a month.' Now, I propose that you and I keep a grumbler's book, and, instead of spitting out our grievances as fast as they come to us, causing the mother a sore heart and everybody else a great deal of annoyance, we will write them in this book. Then we will constitute Uncle John inspector, and it shall be his duty to investigate the contents of the grumbler's book every Saturday night, in the presence of the entire family. What do you say to writing a book in this way?"

Fred. was obliged to wait a moment for a reply to his question. The fact was, Anna did not feel at all inclined to favor this project, for she realized that, in a measure, the so-called satisfaction arising trom speaking one's complaints would be lost in an attempt to write them: for really measure, the so-called satisfaction arising from speaking one's complaints would be lost in an attempt to write them; for really there were more truth than there seemed to be in Uncle John's remark that the she "must be miserable in order to be happy." All gramplers will understand this. Moreover, the idea that all her complaints for a week were to be brought before the family every Saturday night did not seem to her quite a pleasant one. Still, after a moment or two, she remarked to Fred that, if he was willing to do his grumbling in this way, she would undertake it too; so the matter was settled.

marked Uncle John. "It is really quite a serious matter when a carpet becomes as old-fashioned and a dress so shabby as to spoil any young lady's happiness for a whole day."

THE GRUMBLER'S BOOK.

W. N. Burr is the independent.

For several days Anna Parker had been cross. Nothing seemed to be as it should be. The sun shone too brightly, or not brightly enough; the grass should have blue, instead of green, and the sky green instead of blue. At church she observed that the minister's necktie was awry, the singing bad, the organ out of tune, and "the old church had never looked so shabby and old-fashioned before." At home, they "never had things as other folks had them." The parlor carpet was old-fashioned and worn, every room in the sold-fashioned and the way and shall are sold-fashioned and the sold-fashioned and the way and sold-in this way, she would undertake it too; so the matter was settled.

On the following Monday morning a blank book was given to Fred by his uncle, and placed Fred and Anna only knew where. Mrs. Parker was not in the "secret," and, as day after day passed and no word of complaint was heard from either Fred or Anna, her surprise almost equal-edher delight. Only a mother placed in exactly the same situation can realize what a week that was for Mrs. Parker.

Saturday night came in due time. All were gathered "round the evening lamp," busied in varied ways. Mrs. Parker, Uncle John and Fred absorbed in their occupations. Anna, however, appeared restless as a leaf, taking up now this, now that plece of work, turning the leayes of several books, but too uneasy to undertake to read; and finally she was forced to inquire:—

"Fred, will the inspector attend to his duty to-night?"

Mrs. Parker glanced at Anna with a wondering look, evidently bewildered by her question; and she was not at all each of the properties of the glendon of the properties of the properties of the glendon of the mistake. The market first changed for the better to the producers last July, when prices, that had fallen to $14 and $16, began to advance. When it was found that American iron-ores were $10 and more in advance of foreign on every ton, manufacturers were reduced to the expedient of filling their orders with large allow of inferior metal or waiting for the change which everybody saw must come. Some iron merchants, however, are of opinion that the present low rates will not continue.

The parlor carpet was old-fashioned and worn, every room in the room was too small, and she was "tired to death of those everlasting old stoves, when everybody else in town has grates."
